The capitalistic urge

When the Russian military broke into the castle and began employing chemical weapons (March 18, 1918), World War II, it may be remembered, went quite well for Protestantism. The Russians, who had been living on the continent of Europe, were divided into two groups: one was the Russian Orthodox Church, the other was the Russian Catholic Church. Both sides were engaged in a fierce battle, and the winner was to be seen as the victor over the other.

One can picture a Russian family living in a castle, never knowing the noise of war. But after some time, their lives began to change. It was not that the Russians were not interested in what was happening outside the walls of their castle. But as time went on, the families in the castle became more and more isolated from the rest of the world. They were cut off from news of what was happening outside the walls of their castle. They were cut off from news of what was happening outside the walls of their castle. They were cut off from news of what was happening outside the walls of their castle.
