EARTH: Will Hype Eco-Awareness?

Continued from E3

Institute's rise to fame in summer, 1988, when the club posted a record $300,000 tab for drinks. The last time an American club in Europe, the Beatles in Rome, was known for spending so much. And the United States, seen as a place where nothing is too expensive, was suddenly being seen as a place where nothing is too expensive. It was a revolution.

The club's success was due in part to the fact that it was located in the middle of Manhattan, near Times Square. The club's reputation for spending was growing, and the club was becoming a favorite among celebrities and businesspeople. The club was known for its lavish parties and its high-end clientele. The club was also known for its opulent decor, with its walls covered in mirrors and its chandeliers hanging from the ceiling. The club was a symbol of the excess and the opulence that was becoming a part of the American way of life.

The club's success was also due to the fact that it was located in the middle of Manhattan, near Times Square. The club's reputation for spending was growing, and the club was becoming a favorite among celebrities and businesspeople. The club was known for its lavish parties and its high-end clientele. The club was also known for its opulent decor, with its walls covered in mirrors and its chandeliers hanging from the ceiling. The club was a symbol of the excess and the opulence that was becoming a part of the American way of life.

The club's success was also due to the fact that it was located in the middle of Manhattan, near Times Square. The club's reputation for spending was growing, and the club was becoming a favorite among celebrities and businesspeople. The club was known for its lavish parties and its high-end clientele. The club was also known for its opulent decor, with its walls covered in mirrors and its chandeliers hanging from the ceiling. The club was a symbol of the excess and the opulence that was becoming a part of the American way of life.