SANE vs. CRNP

Student Debate Centers On Disarmament Topic

By JEFF ALDERMAN

"Is disarmament feasible?" This was the topic of discussion in a recent debate between The Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and the Committee for a Realistic Nuclear Policy sponsored by the International Student Club in the Redfield Proctor Hall Wednesday, Feb. 28.

After opening remarks by moderator John Wullich ’64, Robert Finkelnstein ’64, chairman of SANE, began the debate with a statement advocating multilateral disarmament. "Peace programs involve risks as do arms programs, but the risks are greater in an arms race," commented Finkelnstein. He added that he felt President Kennedy thought disarmament the safer of the two policies. "Deterrence can be considered a plan for the future," he continued.

Finkelnstein quoted C. P. Snow, who predicts a nuclear war within the next ten years. Also cited in his delivery was the fact that accidental nuclear war is possible through a misjudgment.

The leader of Middlebury’s SANE group listed his suggestions for a possible disarmament plan: statement by all nations involved that they would attack only when attacked themselves; disarmament in Berlin; no atmospheric testing; and a six-year disarmament program.

Jeffrey Rabin ’64, representative and organizer of the college’s CRNP group, opposed Finkelnstein’s arguments, saying that he was "against nuclear disarmament of any kind if it will endanger the security of the U.S.A."
